

For my Daughter on your Wedding Day,

I am writing you this letter because I am not there in person today, but please know that I am there with you, always. I am in your heart, and sending you all of my love and support, I hope you know that and can feel my presence. I know this is a day you have been dreaming of since you were a little girl.

The man that you have chosen to be your husband must be special, because I know that your Dad would not have allowed this marriage to happen if he wasn't. I hope he treats you like precious gold and that he would walk over broken glass to be there for you when you need him.

Here are some words of advice from your Momma:

You are Enough! If you are ever feeling doubt or insecure in your marriage, do not ever question your worth. There is nothing within yourself that needs to change for you to be loved. If anyone ever tries to convince you otherwise, they do not have a place in your life.

Don't lose yourself in your relationship. Keep your interests, your friends, and make sure to take some alone time. Do things for yourself so you continue to be who you are and grow and keep learning! There is plenty of room for self-love and romantic love in a marriage.

Know what you want for your life and stay true to that. Make sure you understand and share your needs with your husband, and stick to your goals and desires. Make sure you get out of marriage what you put into it. Love hard and fierce. Be kind, be gentle, be gracious and expect that in return.

Talk, talk, talk. Never stop communicating. Even if you are mad, say everything you want to say, be gentle with your words, but make sure you share your feelings, your fears and your dreams. Find a way to discuss issues in your life that works for both of you. And listen. Own your mistakes and apologize. Expect the same in return...
